Research Interests

Media and health. This research uses social cognitive and traditional social psychological methodologies to better understand factors that mediate the relationship between exposure to portrayals of health behaviors in popular media and advertising and the initiation and maintenance of those health behaviors in adolescents and college students. The research includes structural equation modeling of the theoretical basis for media-attitude relationships using content analysis data and longitudinal surveys of health behaviors and media, laboratory research examining the perceptual and information processing components of viewing health behaviors, and survey research to examine perceptions of health behaviors. My recent research examines perceptions and use of e-cigarettes and the effects of e-cigarette marketing on implicit attitudes.

Technology and psychology. Recent research examines perceptions of virtual reality technologies and utilizes virtual reality technology to study social psychological phenomenon as well as human factors in performance. Other research explores the effects of communication technology (email, instant messaging, social media sites and apps) on psychological outcomes in college students, and examines the applicability of traditional social psychological theories of self-presentation and relationship management within social media.

Other research interests. Self-esteem, self-efficacy, and self-presentation. The dynamics of interactions between stigmatized and non-stigmatized individuals. The influence of negative emotions on self-regulatory behavior and the ability to control risky behaviors. The link between personality and excuse making. Gender and psychology.
